

Once upon a time, there was a _____ -coloured pony named _____. The pony lived with all of their friends on a sprawling farm, in a beautiful town called _____. _____ and the farm were both owned by _____; the pony's favourite person in the whole wide world. Every morning, _____ would get up early before school just to feed the pony their favourite treat in the world. Although _____ loved all kinds of food, there was nothing better to them than a heaping handful of _____. Even when _____ was running late, they always found time to give _____ a quick snack and a pet before rushing off to class.

After the pony watched _____ get on the school bus and drive off into the distance, they would get up to all sorts of mischief with their pals during the day. The horses started by _____ and _____ around the field, neighing at each other as they kicked up dust. Then, when they got bored of that, they would go down to the _____. hang out in the _____, or play a game of _____. In between all the activities they would break for lunch, and share laughs in between bites of _____.

At 3:30pm, _____ would return home from school - just in time for their riding lesson! _____ and their owner _____ had been competing for years together in the _____ discipline(s). The pony loved any time spent under saddle, but their absolute favourite part of each lesson was _____. Why was it their favourite? Because, _____ of course!

After each ride, the pony and their rider liked to cool out by _____. At this point it was usually about 5pm, and golden hour was upon them. This was their favorite time to relax together, and when they would often catch up and tell each other about _____.

After dinner had been fed and night chores had been completed, _____ would say goodnight to _____ before heading off to _____. "Sleep well my precious pony" _____ would say, giving the pony a final pat before tucking them in for the night. After that, _____ would go to sleep and have the sweetest dreams, knowing that another day of fun and adventure would be awaiting them when they woke up.